

BIG SCREEN CLASSICS

Sunrise A Song of Two Humans

Sunrise A Song of Two Humans

Director: F.W. Murnau
Production Company:
Fox Film Corporation
Studio Head: Winfield R. Sheehan
Producer: William Fox
Assistant Director: Herman Bing
Scenario: Carl Mayer
Titles: Katherine Hilliker, H.H. Caldwell
Comedy Consultant: William Conselman
Based on the novel: Die Reise nach Tilsit
by: Hermann Sudermann
Directors of Photography:
Charles Rosher, Karl Struss
Assistant Cameramen:
Stuart Thompson, Hal Carney
Stills: Frank Powolny
Special Effects: Frank D. Williams
Editor: Harold Schuster
Art Director: Rochus Gliese
Art Department: Gordon Wiles
Assistant Art Directors: Alfred Metscher
Make-up: Carl Dudley
Cast:
George O'Brien (the man)
Janet Gaynor (the wife)
Margaret Livingston
(the woman from the city)
Bodil Rosing (the maid)
J. Farrell MacDonald (the photographer)
Ralph Sipperly (the hairdresser)
Jane Winton (the manicure girl)
Arthur Housman (the obtrusive gentleman)
Eddie Boland (the obliging gentleman) uncredited
Gino Corrado (barbershop manager)
Gibson Gowland (angry driver)
Sidney Bracey (dancehall manager)
Phillips Smalley (head waiter)
Barry Norton (dancer)
F.W. Murnau (vacationer on boat)
Sally Eilers
Herman Bing
Robert Kortman
Robert Parrish
Leo White
USA 1927©
94 mins
Digital

With Hugo Riesenfeld score

+ intro by freelance film programmer
Margaret Deriaz on Wednesday 10
January.

SIGHT AND SOUND

Never miss an issue with Sight and Sound, the BFI's internationally renowned film magazine. Subscribe from just £25*

* Price based on a 6-month print subscription (UK only). More info:
sightandsoundsubs.bfi.org.uk

SIGHT AND SOUND

When F.W. Murnau left Germany for America in 1926, did cinema foresee what was coming? Did it sense that change was around the corner – that now was the time to fill up on fantasy, delirium and spectacle before talking actors wrenched the art-form closer to reality? Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans – the pinnacle of Murnau's silent career – certainly suggests this was the case.

Many things make this film more than just a morality tale about temptation and lust, a fable about a young husband so crazy with desire for a city girl that he contemplates drowning his wife, an elemental but sweet story of a husband and wife rediscovering their love for each other. Sunrise was an example – perhaps never again repeated on the same scale – of unfettered imagination and the clout of the studio system working together rather than at cross purposes. Murnau had a new Fox studio to transform into moonlit marshes and dazzling gargantuan cityscapes. In his quest for optical experimentation he used every tool available (superimposition, in-camera trickery), inventing those that didn't already exist (such as his flying camera, floating from cranes above).

Testament to Murnau's remarkable achievement was the fact that post-Sunrise cinema could never again be dismissed as lightweight amusement in quite the same way. Combining Expressionism's shadows and shards of light with the lyricism of Dutch genre painting, Murnau decreed that cinema could do what art does, and more...

Isabel Stevens, Sight and Sound, September 2012

In Jonathan Rosenbaum and Adrian Martin's publication Movie Mutations Raymond Bellour includes F.W. Murnau on his list of 'transcendental' filmmakers, whose greatness is unquestioned but whose work is rarely discussed nowadays. DVDs of Murnau's films have hopefully gone some way towards convincing younger cinephiles that he is a filmmaker with contemporary relevance rather than the property of academics.

Sunrise tells the tale of a nameless farmer (George O'Brien) seduced by a sophisticated woman (Margaret Livingston) who encourages him to kill his young wife (Janet Gaynor). While the film's ideas about sexuality – in which women are defined as mothers or whores – might at first glance seem to belong to a distant era, one could argue that such notions are still very much with us, their assumptions skillfully disguised.

As Robin Wood has pointed out in a series of Film Comment articles, Sunrise is the central part of a loose trilogy that begins with Nosferatu Eine Symphonie des Grauens (1922) and ends with Murnau's final film Tabu (1931). In all three films a young and 'innocent' heterosexual couple find their happiness threatened by a single powerful individual. But whereas the first two films associate sexuality with an external menace, in Tabu it is the couple who are sexual, and the force that threatens them is a castrating father figure. If Nosferatu and Sunrise suggest that 'evil' is a product of the id, Tabu connects it with the superego.

Murnau's lost 1928 film 4 Devils was virtually a remake of Sunrise: in both films a sophisticated woman lures a young man away from his sexually innocent lover. 4 Devils clearly presented its hero and heroine as childlike, and what struck me on watching Sunrise again in this light is the film's emphasis on its central couple's immaturity: 'They used to be like children,' insists a neighbour, her words confirmed by deliberately clichéd imagery of the protagonists' happy past. It is hardly surprising that the homosexual Murnau should have viewed heterosexual fulfilment as a fantasy (the joke of the famous church-steps sequence is surely that the man and the woman have been 'mistaken' for something they are not – two married adults). But here the city woman, whose outlaw sexuality was closer to the director's own, is portrayed in purely negative terms. This woman is essentially the bad (because sexual) mother, and if her attraction to the farmer seems on the face of it almost totally inexplicable, the Oedipal nature of her relationship with him is neatly defined by a scene in which she cradles his head in her lap, like a mother comforting her child.

Brad Stevens, Sight and Sound, February 2004

No sooner had the German film industry made its spectacular post-war recovery than it began to haemorrhage talent to the Hollywood studio bosses competing for big names.

BIG SCREEN CLASSICS

Shoot the Pianist Tirez sur le pianist
Mon 1 Jan 15:30; Sat 13 Jan 12:10; Tue
16 Jan 14:30

Charulata

Tue 2 Jan 20:40; Sun 14 Jan 17:45; Thu
18 Jan 14:30

Psycho (Original Theatrical Cut)

Wed 3 Jan 18:10; Fri 12 Jan 20:50; Thu
18 Jan 18:20

The Lady from Shanghai

Thu 4 Jan 20:40; Wed 17 Jan 18:30 (+ intro by Geoff Andrew, Programmer-at-large); Fri 26 Jan 18:10

Lift to the Scaffold

 Ascenseur pour l'échafaud

Fri 5 Jan 18:35; Sun 14 Jan 11:50; Tue
23 Jan 20:45

Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans

Sat 6 Jan 12:15; Wed 10 Jan 18:10 (+
intro by freelance film programmer
Margaret Deriaz); Fri 19 Jan 18:15

The Lady Eve

Sun 7 Jan 12:20; Thu 25 Jan 18:30

California Split

Mon 8 Jan 20:45; Mon 22 Jan 18:10

8 1/2 Otto e mezzo

Tue 9 Jan 17:30; Sun 28 Jan 18:00

Madame de...

Thu 11 Jan 14:40; Sun 21 Jan 12:10;
Wed 31 Jan 17:50 (+ intro by film critic Phuong Le)

The Portrait of a Lady

Fri 12 Jan 14:30; Sat 27 Jan 18:00; Tue
30 Jan 20:15

A Serious Man

Mon 15 Jan 18:10; Mon 29 Jan 20:45

The Bigamist

Sat 20 Jan 11:45; Wed 24 Jan 18:10 (+ intro by Foster Hirsch, author and professor, Brooklyn College of the City
University of New York); Sat 27 Jan
21:00

BECOME A BFI MEMBER

Enjoy a great package of film benefits including priority booking at BFI Southbank and BFI Festivals. Join today at bfi.org.uk/join

BFI PLAYER

We are always open online on BFI
Player where you can watch the best new, cult & classic cinema on demand.
Showcasing hand-picked landmark British and independent titles, films are available to watch in three distinct ways:
Subscription, Rentals & Free to view.

See something different today on player.bfi.org.uk

Join the BFI mailing list for regular programme updates. Not yet registered? Create a new account at www.bfi.org.uk/signup

None was bigger than Murnau after the success of two films in very different genres, The Last Laugh (1924) and Faust (1926), and William Fox gave him carte blanche to create this elemental fable of temptation leading to redemption. Only in silent cinema could there be 'The Man' and 'The Woman', living in a fishing village near A City. Janet Gaynor played her second innocent of the same year (alongside 7th Heaven), partnered this time by George O'Brien, as the husband who thinks better of his murderous plan. But more than with almost any other film, it's the composition and movement of Sunrise that grip us as we follow the pair from a rural paradise, via a magical trolley-car ride, to the City, where they're reconciled amid its impersonal bustle.

The vast exterior set that Murnau's art department built became almost as famous as Griffith's Babylon for Intolerance a decade earlier, and was adapted for several other Fox films; but unlike Metropolis, it never becomes the focus of attention. This remains fixed on the archetypal couple and their experiences, recalling the contrasting vignettes of high and low life in The Last Laugh. Both films were written by Carl Mayer, the unsung genius of Weimar cinema, who had launched its success with The Cabinet of Dr Caligari (1919) and believed passionately in film as visual storytelling, with few or ideally no titles to break the spell. If Sunrise still moves us, in a version that's survived with its original orchestral score by Hugo Reisenfeld, it's surely due to Mayer's vision being so faithfully realised by all concerned. Four years later, Murnau was dead and Mayer died impoverished in wartime London, but Sunrise still radiates its magic.

Ian Christie, Sight and Sound, November 2013

Warner Bros. was first out of the gate with The Jazz Singer in 1927, but William Fox had been developing his 'Movietone' technology and picking up patents left, right and centre – including crucially the rights to the Tri-Ergon system – a couple of years before Al Jolson uttered his prophetic ad lib, 'You ain't heard nothin' yet.' Probably the most ambitious of the moguls, Fox was well aware of the power of patents. In the previous decade he had been the last holdout, the independent who broke Thomas Edison's stifling Motion Picture Patents Company and laid the foundation stone of the studio system.

With the introduction of Fox Movietone (initially for newsreels), the acquisition of numerous upscale theatres (including the Loews chain and the 6,000-seat Roxy in New York) and the arrival of F.W. Murnau from Germany, arguably the greatest director of the era, Fox staked his claim to the top spot in the Hollywood hierarchy. If everything went to plan he would consolidate his position with the introduction of the widescreen Grandeur process (pioneered by Raoul Walsh in The Big Trail in 1930), for which he personally held the patent.

Murnau was his ace. Fox saw The Last Laugh in New York in December 1924 and offered the filmmaker carte blanche to make a picture of his own choosing. He put the entire resources of his studio at Murnau's disposal, and agreed to let him retain his core UFA production team for Sunrise: A Song of Two Humans (1927). Like Orson Welles in 1940, Murnau enjoyed unparalleled privilege on the strength of his pedigree as an artist and innovator, someone who would bestow quality and prestige on the business. Fox believed his contract directors (among them John Ford, Raoul Walsh and Frank Borzage) would learn from the German's prodigious technique, his mastery of the mobile camera and his commitment to visual storytelling.

The qualities of Sunrise have been well documented (it was placed fourth on the Cahiers du cinéma poll of the best 100 films last year). In many ways it represents the apogee of the silent era, a synthesis of filmic devices including dissolves, tracking shots, expressionist acting and lighting and breath-taking set design – and a Movietone score and effects track. Ford called Sunrise 'the greatest motion picture ever produced,' and at the first Academy Awards it was singled out as 'Best Picture, Unique and Artistic Production' (as opposed to Wings, 'Best Picture, Production').

For all its sophistication, Sunrise failed to recoup its costs – it was the first chink in William Fox's strategy. While relations between the studio boss and Murnau remained warm, Fox imposed a happy ending on the German's second Hollywood picture, 4 Devils (1928, now lost). By the time Murnau shot his third, City Girl, the interference became too great, and the director set sail for Tahiti before the film was finished.

Tom Charity, Sight and Sound, March 2009